INTRODUCTORY

With an array like the present gathering of Chinese rugs, it is easy to conceive their salient share amid the sumptuous furnishings that existed during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries in the Celestial Empire. For at these periods the luxury of the Mandarin classes appears to have been in its highest form of development, if not really extreme. Therefore, such achievements of the weaver's art have, like the Chinese velvets of those epochs, figured among the glories of a people who have long lived in a beautiful world.

Such rugs figured among imperial gifts to Buddhist temples, to successful statesmen, to soldier or scholar; this makes them no less attractive, since they were carefully preserved and shown only on state occasions with pride as precious witnesses of some ancestral genius or hero.

It may be within the memory of a few collectors that Chinese rugs first made their appearance in Paris probably twenty years ago—where the small number that did reach there very promptly excited the admiration of connoisseurs—for they at once revealed a charm in color and symmetry of design that was unknown before in Eastern floor covering. During the last few years it naturally followed that China was sacked, so to speak, from end to end for their kind, therefore it may be easily conjectured that the search is becoming more and more difficult, together with advancing values.

The products of this interesting industry, coming down to us from those former times, when weaving and dyeing had reached its greatest perfection, are readily distinguished by a peculiar silky texture, which together with certain soft coloring can only be noted on true specimens, since more modern rugs coming from the looms of Peking, whether washed and treated to look antique, never approach the excellence of quality nor the tones of old weaves. A most casual inspection of the rug collection now exhibited, where quality rather than quantity is a feature, will reveal the Chinese devotion to symbolism, for one may note conventionalized flower and allegorical fruit motifs, Buddhist, or Taoist emblems; of longevity and good fortune, just as upon their choice porcelains.
